The present invention is directed to an endosurgery apparatus. More particularly, the present invention is directed to an endosurgery apparatus having a distal end that is moved through the body to a site for surgery. Endoscopic surgical techniques have been widely adopted since initially introduced. Endoscopic surgeries are minimally invasive, i.e., requiring only a small access point or portal in the body, as opposed to performing an open surgical procedure that requires a large incision, thereby reducing trauma and patient recovery time. The portability and decreased size of endoscopic instruments provides a patient benefits such as a shorter hospitalization period. Endoscopic surgical procedures typically include use of an endoscope to provide remote visualization of the surgical site. It is therefore desirable to provide 50b96ab0b6
