What I will say is that I will never denounce the fact that we have a law-and-order society. In other words, we have a society where there is a police force that goes after criminals. Now I want to make clear at the outset that this government doesn't want criminals who violate the law to be off scot-free. Just as a society benefits when we push the envelope when it comes to the rule of law, we also benefit when we punish the law breakers. So while we will never abolish the police, we will abolish the police laws that are too draconian. We are constantly looking to the police to make sure that our penal law is applied vigorously and fairly. Our position on the law and order issue has got to be a balance. We will be a law-and-order society but also a justice society. There will be justice for the victims of crime. Unfortunately, there are many serious crimes committed in our society that go underreported. This crime rate has gotten out of hand. I will not succumb to the urge to make a knee-jerk reaction on that part and argue that as long as the murders go unreported, that's okay. What I will say is that we have to examine and also explore the reasons why it has gone so out of hand. You know, one of the reasons why the crime rate has gone up is that crime has become cool. I was reading an article yesterday in The Straits Times and they mentioned that China at one time decided to have a major focus on providing incentives for criminals to go to jail. In that country, almost the first thing that a young man did after he joined the gang was
